Responsive Grantmaking Is Strategic
All images and quotes featured throughout this report reflect the diverse populations served by the grantees of The California Wellness Foundation. We thank them all for their participation in the production of our annual report.
At The California Wellness Foundation (TCWF), our work revolves around our mission to improve the health of the people of California by making grants for health promotion, disease prevention and wellness education. The past fiscal year was extended to an 18-month period, so that our accounting cycle — which formerly began in July — could be changed to coincide with the calendar year. During this period, the staff reviewed 2,355 letters of interest and made grant recommendations to the Board of Directors, which approved more than 500 grants totaling more than $48 million. We encourage you to review the Grants section of this report, which provides a comprehensive list of board-approved grants for the 18-month fiscal year.

In December 2000, after a two-year process of strategic planning, the Board approved a new grantmaking strategy for the Foundation: the Responsive Grantmaking Program. Four goals were established with the intention of building cohesiveness across the Foundation's grantmaking:

- To address the particular health needs of traditionally underserved populations, including low-income individuals, people of color, youth and residents of rural areas;
- To support and strengthen nonprofit organizations that seek to improve the health of underserved populations;
- To recognize and encourage leaders who are working to increase health and wellness within their communities; and
- To inform the development of public policies that promote wellness and enhance access to preventive health care.
The Responsive Grantmaking Program represents a significant evolution in TCWF's definition of strategic philanthropy. Our initial emphasis was on “proactive” grantmaking, with the majority of grant dollars allocated to initiatives and substantial sums set aside for large-scale evaluations. Now, we consciously strive to strike a balance between Foundation-driven programs and a more responsive approach. This represents a real “sea change.”

Our initiatives focused on ideas that originated at the Foundation. We regarded the organizations chosen to implement those ideas as secondary in importance to the goals of the initiatives. In our new approach, we start with organizations whose mission is to improve the health of underserved populations in California. Our conversation with them begins with their mission and how our funding might help them best fulfill it.

In contrast to our initiatives, with their complex array of moving parts, our new approach follows an intentionally simpler design. This doesn’t mean that we are sacrificing coherence or that there is no structure to the work. Within some general parameters that define our priorities and focus, we encourage a variety of proposals, particularly for core operating support. The structure of the grantmaking around a particular health issue will further evolve over time — as clusters of grants are made and the Board and staff’s experience with those grants is assessed. Our intention is to remain maximally responsive to developments while getting to know the players throughout the state.

The four grantmaking goals encompass cross-cutting themes — underserved populations, sustainability, leadership and public policy — that create the opportunity to view our grantmaking as one cohesive program. This has dramatically reduced the “silos effect” that permeates through so many foundations and was ever-present at TCWF in our previous initiative-style grantmaking. We no longer use the phrase “program area” to describe our work on a specific health issue. Rather, we have a single grantmaking program addressing a number of health issues as we pursue our mission to improve the health of the people of California. In this approach, the whole is greater than the sum of its parts.

The cover story for this annual report provides a preliminary look at the first three years of grantmaking under the Responsive Grantmaking Program. We believe the story illustrates how this philanthropic approach is allowing the Foundation to be more flexible in its funding strategies and better able to support the essential efforts of nonprofits working to improve the health of underserved Californians.

Sincerely,

Responsive Grantmaking
Is Strategic
COVER STORY
No single grantmaking institution has the resources to meet all the health needs of the people of California. For this reason, every health foundation struggles to find the philanthropic approach that will yield maximum benefits for target populations.

Underserved populations — low-income individuals, people of color, youth and residents of rural areas — are the primary focus of The California Wellness Foundation (TCWF). Founded in 1992, TCWF initially pursued its mission of improving the health of underserved people in California through highly structured Foundation-designed grantmaking initiatives funded through a competitive request-for-proposal process. This approach proved effective in achieving policy changes and in providing comprehensive health services through community-based programs.

Over the years, however, discussions with grantees and feedback from surveys of applicants and grantees alerted the Foundation to a disturbing consequence of this strategy. Many expressed frustration that TCWF was largely interested only in funding its own initiative programs and new projects, leaving the organizations struggling to cover operating costs. They said that they faced tremendous difficulties meeting the basic expenses of their core activities.

TCWF realized that by locking up most of its grantmaking dollars in five- and 10-year initiatives — however positive their outcomes — it was unintentionally contributing to the distress of those nonprofit organizations that received grants and, in the process, excluding many other organizations from obtaining funding.
This conclusion helped inform a two-year strategic planning process by the Foundation’s Board of Directors. As a result, in December 2000, the Board adopted a new Responsive Grantmaking Program that is guided by four goals:

- To address the particular health needs of traditionally underserved populations, including low-income individuals, people of color, youth and residents of rural areas;

- To support and strengthen nonprofit organizations that seek to improve the health of underserved populations;

- To recognize and encourage leaders who are working to increase health and wellness within their communities; and

- To inform the development of public policies that promote wellness and enhance access to preventive health care.

The Foundation began to implement this new approach on July 1, 2001, and has made 983 grants totaling $125 million through December 2004. The new funding strategy attempts to balance the Foundation-directed approach with responses to unsolicited letters of interest. The emphasis is on providing core operating support for nonprofits that work to improve the health of underserved Californians.

Grantees have reported that this emphasis has been especially helpful during the state budget crisis of the past three years. Since 2001, nonprofit health organizations have experienced a barrage of woes: government funding cuts resulting from shortfalls in federal, state and county budgets; reduced levels of charitable donations; and increased demand for services, resulting from rising health care costs, unemployment and public health facility closures.

TCWF grants have been used in many ways: to cover the costs of ongoing health care services; to strengthen the infrastructures of nonprofit health organizations, to fortify essential nonprofit leadership; and to advance policies that seek to improve the health of underserved communities in California.

In most cases, these grants shed light on the work of marginalized and nearly invisible populations. Using the four Foundation goals as our framework, this story highlights the strategies and clusters that are emerging in the first three years of responsive grantmaking.

“When the economy is bad, more people want our services,” said Arcadio Viveros, executive director of Salud Para La Gente, a TCWF grantee that provides out-patient health care in rural Pajaro Valley. “Farm workers are worse off than most because so few have health insurance.”
To address the particular health needs of traditionally underserved populations, including low-income individuals, people of color, youth and residents of rural areas.

The Foundation was established in the early 1990s when Health Net — one of the state’s largest health insurance companies — converted from not-for-profit to for-profit status. The conversion order provided the Foundation with its mission and mandated a focus on the funding of direct health services for underserved populations. TCWF’s commitment to this mandate is demonstrated by the fact that at least 50 percent of our annual grant dollars are dedicated to this purpose.

During the past three years, 570 organizations have received TCWF grants to help them provide preventive health services — including health screenings, case management, counseling, immunizations, prenatal care, family planning and health education — to an estimated 2.4 million individuals.

The evolving grantmaking strategies fall into broad areas:

- Culture-specific services. The vast majority of grants for the provision of preventive health services address the needs of traditionally underserved communities, particularly low-income individuals, people of color, immigrants and refugees. These communities include Oaxacan, Hmong and Lao farm workers, South Asian women, Cambodian and Native American youth, Latino seniors, East African refugees, and Korean and Latino restaurant workers. An emerging strategy is to provide grants to culture-specific or ethnic-specific organizations that provide culturally and linguistically appropriate health services incorporating community traditions and values.
• Vulnerable populations. Low-wage workers in jobs that do not provide employer-based health insurance are among the most vulnerable populations in California. Workers in the restaurant, grocery, farming, garment and home health care industries are subject to fluctuations in the market economy, which have resulted in a sharp decline in job-based health coverage as well as diminished household incomes. Grantees serve as the health care safety net for these workers.

• Geographic outreach. The Foundation staff’s concerted efforts during the past three years to reach out to regions with limited access to health services and communities with frail health care delivery infrastructures have begun to pay off. Targeted outreach was conducted in rural and remote areas, the Inland Empire and the Central Valley. The distribution of TCWF’s grantmaking dollars is closely aligned with the population distribution in California.

• Youth focus. A significant cluster of preventive health services grants prioritizes youth as an underserved population. These grants support programs that provide intensive case management and counseling to help incarcerated youth transition back into the community, on-campus health education for adolescent girls and young women, and academic and social support for students of color interested in pursuing a career in the health professions.
A major focus of the Foundation is to fund community clinics and regional clinic consortia because they constitute a significant portion of the safety net for California’s uninsured and other vulnerable populations. Grants to regional clinic consortia have supported the provision of primary care services through affiliated member clinics throughout California.

“In a period when there’s less public funding for clinical services, The California Wellness Foundation grant has allowed the Alameda Health Consortium clinics to maintain, and in some cases, expand, services such as medical translation, case management and specialized health education,” said Ralph Silber, executive director of the Alameda Health Consortium (AHC).

AHC’s eight nonprofit community health centers are the principal providers of primary and preventive health services to low-income people in Alameda County. AHC’s strong collaborative track record has helped member clinics expand their role as providers of comprehensive health care to the underserved.

“At the Consortium level, we wanted to help set up the systems so the clinics could transition to a Medi-Cal managed care model,” said AHC’s Silber. “That has been very successful and has allowed us to compete successfully under Medi-Cal Managed Care. This is an example of how an investment by the Foundation has increased in value many times over.”
To support and strengthen nonprofit organizations that seek to improve the health of underserved populations.

Providing core operating support to strengthen infrastructure and support the provision of existing health services for underserved populations may not be considered strategic grantmaking by some. However, under the economic and fiscal conditions that prevail today, we believe that sustaining struggling nonprofits is one of the most strategic things a foundation can do for those who lack access to health care.

During the past three years, grants for core operating support were provided to 561 organizations in California. On average, about two-thirds of core operating support grants are for existing services — i.e., funding operational costs such as rent, salaries, transportation, phones and supplies. This support is especially crucial in today’s uncertain funding environment. The remaining one-third of core operating support grants helps strengthen nonprofit organizations’ internal capacities through strategic planning, fundraising, board development, communications and marketing.

The Foundation emphasizes funding cornerstone organizations because these entities occupy an important niche in a particular health issue or local community. They provide critical health services and have credibility among their constituents. Cornerstone organizations can be defined in several ways. Some are health service providers that constitute the health care safety net for low-income, uninsured Californians. Others are advocacy organizations that work on health access issues at the state, regional and local levels. Still others are research organizations providing valuable data and analysis that help inform policymakers about critical health issues.

Insights and lessons gleaned from the first generation of core support grantees, including a cluster analysis in August 2002, have shaped our core support grantmaking strategy. We are guided by the following general operating principles:

- Provide grants lasting no less than three years to first-time core support grantees and to recipients who have experienced a break in previous core support funding. We have found that three years is the minimum period for a core support grant, giving organizations time to cultivate new funding sources, build capacity to raise and hire and train staff.

- Provide no more than six years of consecutive core support funding without at least a one-year (preferably two-year) break. Consecutive core support grants allow sufficient levels of funding and time for an organization to stabilize itself. (For example, during this period, TCWF recommended a second round of core support grants for clusters of organizations working to address environmental health and work and health issues.) The Foundation may make exceptions for specific compelling circumstances and for cornerstone organizations — such as urban and rural clinic consortia — that provide critical health services. Now in their eighth year of core support funding, the consortia constitute an important component of the health care safety net for low-income communities across California.

- Award annual grant amounts that do not exceed 30 percent of the annual operating budget of the organization (or department or program). This funding level is sufficient to cover specific line items — such as salary for a full-time staff member or one year of rent — yet not so high that it would dominate an organization’s budget, creating an unwise dependency on a single funding source.

Despite the increasing challenges of the funding environment, early reports from our grantees indicate the value, timeliness and flexibility of TCWF’s core support grants. For example, some grants helped bridge funding gaps until Medi-Cal funds were secured or until a community clinic was designated as a Federally Qualified Health Center (FQHC), ensuring a more stable income source. Core support grants have also enabled organizations to hire their first executive director or to fund the salary of a development person who can dedicate time to diversifying the funding base and securing long-term support.
The Economic Opportunity Commission of San Luis Obispo County (EOC) provides clinical reproductive health services for low-income women in a geographic area where these services are scarce — a situation that recently became even more dire when the county health department shut its family planning clinic in south San Luis Obispo County. The EOC is using a core operating grant from TCWF to fund a staff position, as part of a strategy to increase billings and raise the clinic’s revenues.

“Our core support grant from the Foundation has been important because it allowed us to free up revenue so that we could fund a development position that focuses not only on grant writing, but also on marketing our clinical services, which is another way to generate income,” said Sally Rogow, EOC Health Services Division’s planning and development specialist. “Nonprofit health agencies are struggling because they don’t have core operating support. It is so hard to find, and yet so needed to cover such basic things as staff salaries.”

To recognize and encourage leaders who are working to increase health and wellness within their communities.

Another strategy to sustain the nonprofit health sector is to develop and fortify its leadership. This can be accomplished by fostering new leaders among populations or geographic regions that are underrepresented or by shining a light on those who are making a difference in the health of underserved Californians and drawing attention to the exemplary qualities that make them stand out.

During the past three years, grants were provided to 131 organizations for leadership development and recognition programs. An estimated 10,800 individuals will benefit from these programs.

Most of the grants made for leadership development were the result of unsolicited letters of interest. The programs generally fall into one of three categories:

- Faith-based programs: Leaders from local congregations train to become community organizers and advocates.

- Peer-driven programs: Former foster youth train as peer mentors and become resources for youth emancipating from the child welfare system; farm workers train to become promotores de salud (health promoters) to help improve health and housing conditions for their communities.

- Community resident programs: Individuals residing in affected communities train as leaders to work on local campaigns addressing environmental health concerns. The training provided to these leaders prepares them to advocate for themselves and to respond quickly to emerging issues.
One result of leadership development programs is that individuals may discover they are more capable than they had realized. A woman who worked with the Center for Community Action and Environmental Justice, a TCWF grantee, presented her thoughts at a public hearing for the first time. “When the 200 people in the audience applauded, I felt terrific,” she said. “I never thought anybody cared what I thought or said. Now I know I matter.”

The woman went on to participate in a two-year battle to stop a polluting facility that endangered the health of the community, playing a key role in translating materials and motivating her neighbors to stay involved. As a result, the company that operated the facility turned in its permit and walked away from the new building it had constructed.
TCWF has also developed a significant cluster of Foundation-initiated leadership recognition programs designed to acknowledge exceptional individuals who demonstrate leadership on important health issues. Leadership recognition is a proactive strategy that often targets public policy by spotlighting the health issue addressed by the individual awardee. Past awardees have worked to prevent violence against youth, create academic pipelines for young people of color and promote a comprehensive approach to preventing teen pregnancy.

The programs include:

- California Peace Prize
- Champions of Health Professions Diversity Award
- Public Policy Leadership Award
- Sabbatical Program; and
- Youth for Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Award.
“Our communities deserve to have access to diverse providers who can understand their culture, economics, social structure and language,” said Katherine A. Flores, M.D., a 2004 TCWF Champion of Health Professions Diversity Award honoree from Fresno. She is the founder of the Sunnyside High School Doctor’s and Junior Doctor’s Academy and the University of California Latino Center for Medical Education and Research.

“Optimal health care involves good communication, and communication is based on language and cultural awareness. Currently, 39 percent of the Central Valley’s population is Latino, but only five percent of physicians and four percent of nurses are Latino.”
Many of California’s nonprofit health executives are susceptible to burnout from overwork. To address this problem, TCWF adapted the Los Angeles sabbatical model established by the Durfee Foundation. TCWF has created a statewide program that provides health nonprofit organizations with grants to cover their chief executives’ salaries during a sabbatical (paid leave) that lasts a minimum of three months.

“I have worked in the field of recovery and mental health for over 29 years and have directed my work toward helping those in need who can afford it least,” said Rick Mesa, a 2004 TCWF sabbatical recipient and executive director of Ranch Recovery Centers in Desert Hot Springs. “I love my work and I plan to continue, but I am simply tired and need an extended break.”

During the two years TCWF’s Sabbatical Program has been operational, grants have been awarded to provide sabbaticals for 12 California nonprofit executives — all of whom have worked in the nonprofit health sector for at least 20 years without a significant break.
Advancing public policy requires multiple approaches that span the public policy continuum. Research and analysis are required to uncover new issues and solutions. Then, ideas must be refined and advanced through policy analysis, advocacy and public education. Once policies are adopted, oversight activities are often needed, including litigation to ensure effective implementation.

Over the past three years, 260 organizations have received grants for public policy activities. Many grantees work primarily in research and analysis, educating policymakers and opinion leaders about the nature of a problem, raising public awareness of neglected health issues, developing effective solutions and building support for those solutions.

Several policy grantees are providing much-needed research in areas where significant information gaps exist. For example, to build a case for policies that increase diversity in the health professions, grantees are conducting research on various aspects of workforce diversity, including retention rates among premedical students, and faculty and staff diversity in public universities.

To build support for mental health services for transition-age youth, grantees are documenting the mental health needs and access barriers for children and youth in the child welfare system. Other grantees are providing policymakers and opinion leaders with analyses of the impact of proposed policies on the health of underserved Californians.

One TCWF grantee is the California Budget Project, which provides comprehensive analyses of the state budget as it moves through the legislative process — an undertaking that has become particularly important during the past three years, when the state has wrestled with serious budget shortfalls.

“I believe there is power in sophisticated policy analysis and research of these issues,” said Jean Ross, executive director and founder of the California Budget Project. “What’s exciting is taking that information and communicating it so that people can make the world better.”
The Foundation’s grants to state and grassroots advocacy organizations help ensure that California’s underserved communities are represented in state and local health policy debates. Grantees working on mental health issues are organizing at the local level to educate and mobilize stakeholders and policymakers to address mental health needs in specific regions. Several grantees are building the advocacy capacity of those individuals and communities most affected by the lack of health services, poor working conditions and exposure to environmental health hazards.

Another component of public policy grantmaking is ensuring effective implementation. Grantees working on women’s health issues are educating institutions about compliance with legislation and regulations addressing access to emergency contraception, health care for women in prison and health issues of homeless women. Grantees working on issues of healthy aging are providing support to seniors as they navigate Medicare regulations and the new prescription drug laws.
The Foundation’s public policy grantees include the statewide office of People Improving Communities through Organizing (PICO) and local PICO affiliates, which help ensure that underserved communities are represented in local and state health policy debates.

“Because so much of the debate at the Capitol is dominated by partisan rhetoric, it is very meaningful when people get involved and have a real dialogue with legislators about what families need,” said Jim Keddy, PICO California’s executive director. “We organize 20 grassroots advocacy groups that represent 350 congregations across California. By organizing through congregations, we’re able to draw upon the tradition, common to many different faith communities, of speaking out for the vulnerable and to access a stable base of leadership who are able to engage in a policy area consistently over a period of years.”

After administering a health survey, PICO member organizations discovered that, in many congregations, more than half of the families lacked private or public health insurance, even though more than 80 percent of adult family members were working. The PICO California statewide office provides training and technical assistance to the local interfaith PICO groups, so that families understand how their health issues can be brought to the attention of legislators.

Among their many activities, the PICO grantees held 22 town hall meetings with state and local officials throughout California, at which more than 7,000 PICO members discussed the effects that proposed budget cuts would have on health care at the local level. PICO California has also brought 4,000 people to Sacramento to advocate for protecting safety net services.

Successes have included obtaining approval from the federal government for California’s waiver request to add parents to the Healthy Families public health insurance program for low-income children. In partnership with the California Primary Care Association, grantees have successfully advocated for more than $50 million in state clinic infrastructure funding. Local PICO affiliates’ victories include securing the use of local tobacco settlement funds for health care.

Foundations attempt to add value to their grantmaking in a variety of ways. Some operate their own programs, providing technical assistance directly to grantees. Others provide an informational resource to opinion leaders and policymakers about the specific issues on which their funding is focused. At TCWF, we pursue several strategies to add value.

Foundation-sponsored events. One of the many ways that the Foundation adds value to its grantmaking is by convening grantees. In the last three years, we held more than 20 grantee-focused conferences and other events, attracting 3,000 attendees. These events facilitated networking, skills building and information sharing among grantees. A feature of these conferences that is often taken for granted is that they are statewide. Grantees working at the local and regional levels have the unique ability to network with colleagues working statewide.

Regranting to intermediary organizations adds value by reaching out to nascent groups that may not have been on our radar. Over the past three years, 15 grants have been made for this purpose. Our strategy is to identify viable institutions that have authentic ties with difficult-to-reach populations. For example, grants for regranting were awarded to the Liberty Hill Foundation, the San Diego Foundation and the
The Foundation’s communications team develops a media rollout for the announcement of honorees of TCWF’s California Peace Prize, Champions of Health Professions Diversity Award and Public Policy Leadership Award programs. This rollout includes advertisements in newspapers, a section on our website devoted to the award program, news releases, electronic media alerts, letters to policymakers and posters.

“One of the most important parts of this award was the public relations and marketing that both my agency and I received to promote the work we have done, not only in our community but also throughout the state of California,” said Brian Contreras, a 2001 California Peace Prize honoree. A former gang member, Contreras is now a violence prevention activist and founder of the Second Chance Youth Program in Salinas.

“Since receiving this award, I have been invited to participate on many commissions and boards and in important political discussions regarding juvenile crime and violence,” Contreras said. “Recently, a visit with Sen. Barbara Boxer helped motivate a substantial investment in our community to help us fight gang violence.”
Vanguard Public Foundation to work with emerging groups addressing environmental health issues in Los Angeles, San Diego and the Central Valley, respectively. The foundations have established relationships with these groups and possess the capacity to provide them with technical assistance in grant proposal writing, fund development, strategic planning and fiscal management.

Provision of technical assistance. Another evolving strategy is to support organizations that provide technical assistance that builds organizational capacity. Technical assistance (TA) grantees provide capacity-building services tailored to the needs of diverse, underserved communities. For example, a grant to the Center for Civic Partnerships (CCP) builds on a TCWF pilot project that offers customized technical assistance to 20 TCWF grantees. CCP acts as a technical assistance broker, connecting grantees to organizational experts and specialists. Another TA grantee, the Los Angeles Immigrant Funders Collaborative, has developed a more nuanced approach to technical assistance, with an engagement over a longer period of time. Viewed as a model by funders in other parts of the country, this group provides mentoring and coaching for immigrant executive leaders and peer-to-peer support. A third TA grantee, the Border Health Initiative, provides intensive capacity-building services to 60 struggling binational organizations working along the U.S.-Mexico border, which are critical to the delivery of health services in this region.

Communications. TCWF’s communications program is one of the major mechanisms used to forward the Foundation’s mission. The focus of our communications program is on telling the stories of grantees through our core publications, website, media relations and advertising.

Funded with the Foundation’s administrative dollars, the cumulative work of the communications program adds significant value to our grantmaking by extending its reach and maximizing its impact.

Conclusion

Three years after the formal launch of TCWF’s Responsive Grantmaking Program, we are beginning to see promising indications of the impact and value of our approaches and strategies with nonprofit organizations and the communities they serve across California. As we incorporate insights and lessons learned, we increase our awareness of areas that would benefit from a fresh approach. In the coming years, we will continue to dedicate our efforts to actively listening and responding to the needs of our constituents.
The Foundation prioritizes eight health issues for funding and responds to timely issues or special projects outside the funding priorities. We encourage requests for core operating support, but requests for project funding are also welcome. Core operating support can be used to help underwrite the regular, ongoing health care, health promotion and disease prevention activities of an organization. Such funds can be used for ongoing organizational costs such as salaries for key administrative staff or operating expenses. Core support funds can also be used for strengthening organizational capacity through activities such as engaging in strategic planning, facilitating board development or developing information systems. Each prioritized health issue is described below. For a list of recent grants and future updates, please visit our website at www.tcwf.org or call the Foundation to request a copy of our newsletter, Portfolio.

Diversity in the Health Professions
Grants that address the issue of diversity in the health professions are commonly given to organizations that provide pipeline programs, scholarships, outreach and retention programs, internships, fellowships and loan repayment programs for ethnic minorities that are underrepresented in the health professions. Careers in medicine, nursing, public health and other allied health professions are included. Organizations that support leadership development for people of color in the health professions are also eligible for funding. In addition, the Foundation funds organizations that educate policymakers and advocate for public and institutional policies that promote diversity in the health professions.

Environmental Health
Grants that address the issue of environmental health are commonly given to organizations that provide environmental health education and awareness activities; community organizing to promote environmental health; screening and testing for exposure to environmental toxins; leadership development; and collaborations such as partnerships between public health departments and community-based health programs to improve environmental health. The Foundation also funds efforts to inform policymakers and advocate for policies that could improve environmental health among underserved populations.

Healthy Aging
Grants that address the issue of healthy aging are commonly given to organizations that provide clinical preventive services, falls prevention programs, food and nutrition programs, in-home support and kinship caregiving. Also funded are organizations that support relationships between youth and older adults through activities such as intergenerational volunteering and mentoring. In addition, the Foundation funds agencies that educate policymakers and advocate for policies that promote healthy aging, as well as organizations that provide leadership development programs for seniors.

Mental Health
Grants that address the issue of mental health are commonly given to organizations that provide services for transition-age youth (ages 16–23) — with a focus on those in, or exiting from, foster care and on runaway/homeless youth. In addition, the Foundation funds organizations that provide leadership development programs for mental health professionals, as well as organizations that inform policymakers and advocate for effective mental health programs and policies for transition-age youth.

Teenage Pregnancy Prevention
Grants that address the issue of teenage pregnancy prevention are commonly given to organizations that provide outreach activities for reproductive health care, access to contraceptive services, and comprehensive programs for pregnant teens. An emphasis is placed on funding peer-provider clinics and other reproductive health organizations that work with high-risk, sexually active, underserved teen populations. The Foundation also funds organizations that provide leadership development activities for reproductive health care workers and organizations that inform policymakers and opinion leaders about effective policies and programs to prevent teen pregnancy.

Violence Prevention
Grants that address the issue of violence prevention are commonly given to organizations that provide services for youth (ages 12–24) including mentoring programs, gang intervention programs, reentry programs, community-based violence prevention programs and after-school programs. An emphasis is placed on funding organizations that work with at-risk youth, including gang-affiliated and previously incarcerated youth. Grants are also made to organizations that provide leadership development activities to those working in the field of violence prevention, as well as organizations that inform policymakers and advocate for public policies that prevent violence against youth.

Women’s Health

Grants that address the issue of women’s health are commonly given to organizations that provide reproductive health care, prenatal care, community-based comprehensive health care services, HIV/AIDS programs for women of color, case management, and supportive housing for homeless women. Priority is given to organizations that create welcoming environments for women in underserved communities. The Foundation also funds organizations that provide leadership development activities for women and those that educate policymakers and advocate for effective policies and programs that promote women’s health.

Work and Health

Grants that address the issue of work and health are commonly given to nonprofit organizations that provide health care services to farm workers, in-home health workers, garment workers, day laborers and other low-income workers. Worker centers that provide culturally sensitive and linguistically appropriate services such as health education and access to health care for low-wage workers are also prioritized for funding. In addition, the Foundation funds organizations that provide leadership development programs for low-wage workers. Organizations that educate policymakers about the connections between work and health and that advocate for policies that could improve the health of low-income workers are funded as well.

Special Projects
Each year, the Foundation sets aside a pool of dollars to respond in a timely fashion to opportunities that fit our mission but are outside the eight health issues prioritized for funding. The Foundation places an emphasis on grants to support and strengthen safety net providers of health care, to help low-income consumers understand and navigate the health care system, and to inform public decision making through policy analysis and advocacy. The Foundation also provides funding to address the health care needs of the Cal/Mex border population, the urban homeless, and culturally appropriate programs for underserved ethnic populations.

How To Apply for a Grant

Application Process
To present The California Wellness Foundation with a grant request, an organization should first write a one- to two-page letter of interest that describes the organization’s mission and activities, the region and population(s) served, the annual operating budget, how the funds will be used, and the total funds requested from the Foundation. If you are requesting project funding, please include the project’s goals, leadership and duration. Your letter will be processed most accurately if you clearly indicate the TCWF funding priority for which you want your request considered. No application form is needed, and formal proposals are not accepted at this preliminary stage.

Foundation staff will review letters of interest on an ongoing basis and notify prospective applicants of the results normally within three to four months. Those encouraged to submit a proposal will receive further guidance at that time.

Eligibility Criteria
With rare exception, the Foundation funds nonprofit organizations that are exempt under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code and are deemed as “not a private foundation” under Section 509(a). The Foundation also funds government agencies.

Grants are not generally awarded for annual fund drives, building campaigns, major equipment or biomedical research. Activities that exclusively benefit the members of sectarian or religious organizations are not considered. The Foundation does not provide international funding or funding for organizations located outside the United States.

FINANCIAL STATEMENTS
The California Wellness Foundation’s condensed statements of financial position and activity for the eighteen months ended December 31, 2004 are presented in this section.

To present a clearer picture of the endowment balance available for charitable purposes, the Foundation has provided condensed financial statement information that departs from generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP) in two ways. First, the accompanying condensed financial statements report only the statement of financial position on December 31, 2004 and statement of activity for the eighteen months ended December 31, 2004 and do not include a statement of cash flow or the accompanying notes to financial statements. Comparative year data for the year ended December 31, 2003 is unavailable as the Foundation changed its fiscal year-end during 2003 from June 30 to December 31. Second, the Foundation has captured under the term “investments,” investments loaned under secured lending transactions, liabilities under investment loan agreements, investment sale receivables and investment purchases payable.

The Foundation’s financial statements undergo an annual audit, which is performed by KPMG LLP. The firm audited the Foundation’s financial statements for the year ended December 31, 2004 and the six months ended December 31, 2003, which are presented in conformity with GAAP, and expressed an unqualified opinion on these financial statements. A copy of KPMG’s audit report dated March 25, 2005 may be viewed on the Foundation’s website at www.tcwf.org.

Additional information about the Foundation can be found in its 2003 Form 990-PF, Return of Private Foundation, which is available by visiting www.tcwf.org in the “About the Foundation” section.

\[1\] For purposes of this presentation, the Foundation has departed from the presentation required under accounting principles generally accepted in the United States of America by netting amounts loaned and payable under security lending agreements and by netting investment sales receivable and investment purchases payable. Had these amounts not been netted, total assets for 2004 would be $1,309,055,738; total liabilities for 2004 would be $275,113,076; and total liabilities and net assets for 2004 would be $1,309,055,738.

Code of Ethics Available on the Website:

Since its inception in 1992, TCWF has pursued its mission in accordance with the fundamental principles of transparency, equity and fairness. In this spirit, the Foundation recently debuted a Code of Ethics section on www.tcwf.org. The section explains in a simple question-and-answer format, how the Foundation adheres to its fundamental principles in setting grantmaking, personnel and investment policies. The document details the safeguards put in place by TCWF to promote accountability, ethics and responsibility in the stewardship of Foundation assets.
